Statement

Introduction

Copyright protects intellectual property by preventing unauthorized copying or alteration without the copyright holder's permission. Official registration is not required for copyright protection; creation of the work is sufficient. Additionally, displaying the © symbol is not necessary. The work must exist in a tangible form, as ideas alone cannot be copyrighted.

Copyright legislation covers four main areas:

- Literary, dramatic, musical, or artistic works (including books and periodicals)
- Films
- Sound recordings, broadcasts, cable programs, and computer-generated works
- Publishers' copyright of typographical arrangements

There is also specific copyright protection for databases, and the legislation extends to most other materials, including electronic resources like the Internet.

In practice, most materials you may want to copy are likely to be protected by copyright. This means that a single work can have multiple copyright claims, such as those by the author, publisher, and illustrator.

All students must comply with current legislation, and violating copyright law will be treated as a disciplinary offense by the university. Additionally, you may face legal action from the copyright owner.

Photocopying

For printed material, copyright lasts for the author's or creator's lifetime and extends for 70 years after their death. Additionally, the typographical arrangement of a publication has a separate copyright lasting 25 years from the date of publication. To simplify matters, copyright legislation includes a provision known as "fair dealing," which permits the copying of material under certain conditions.

Fair Dealing

Fair dealing is an exception to copyright that allows individuals to copy a reasonable portion of literary, dramatic, musical, or artistic works. This generally includes most print and paper-based materials but excludes films, videos/DVDs, sound recordings, or broadcasts, which are covered in separate sections. The principles of fair dealing state that copying does not infringe copyright if:

- It is for personal use or private study, not directly or indirectly for commercial purposes.
- It is for non-commercial research.
- It is for criticism or review, with proper acknowledgment of the original work.
- The specific allowances under fair dealing are:
 - One article from a single issue of a periodical, or one paper from a set of conference proceedings.
 - A maximum of one complete chapter from a book.
 - The entire report of one law case.
 - The whole of a poem or short story not exceeding ten pages, if contained in a collection of such works in book form.

Copyright Duration and Fair Dealing

For printed material, copyright lasts for the author's lifetime plus 70 years after their death. The typographical arrangement of a publication is copyrighted for 25 years from the publication date.

Fair Dealing

Fair dealing allows individuals to copy a reasonable proportion of literary, dramatic, musical, or artistic works. This generally includes most print and paper-based materials but excludes films, videos/DVDs, sound recordings, or broadcasts. Copying under fair dealing is permissible if:

- It is for personal use, private study, or non-commercial research.
- It is for criticism or review with proper acknowledgment.
- The copied portion does not exceed 5% of the work, whichever is greater.

You can copy one complete chapter of a book even if it exceeds 5% of the book's total length, and you can copy multiple chapters from a long book if the total does not exceed 5%. Any copying beyond these limits requires permission from the rights holder or a license.

Scanning

Scanning copyright material for personal use within fair dealing limits is typically acceptable. However, you cannot share scanned copies or make them available on a network without permission. For more details, consult the library staff.

Exclusions to Fair Dealing

Fair dealing does not cover:

- Printed music (including lyrics)
- Maps, charts, or books of tables
- Public examination papers
- Newspapers

Additional Help for Users with Visual Impairment

Under specific licenses, the University may create accessible copies of works for visually impaired individuals. This includes digital, audio, large or small print, or embossed copies, provided:

- The University or requester has lawful possession of the original.
- No accessible copy is commercially available.
- The copy is as accurate as possible for accessibility.
- The copy is used solely by the person for whom it is made.

For more information, consult the library staff.

Using Electronic Resources

Electronic resources are covered by Kazakhstan's copyright legislation and additional licenses, imposing restrictions on copying and usage. Infringement is treated as a disciplinary offense. Always read the license restrictions before making copies. Generally, you can:

- Read an article on screen.
- Download an article or chapter for personal use in research, teaching, or private study.
- Print an article or chapter for personal use in research, teaching, or private study.

You are not allowed to:

- Use the material for commercial purposes.
- Share the material with unauthorized users (typically anyone outside the University).
- Make multiple copies or excessive copying from a single source.
- Alter the material, including copyright statements.

Copying from the Internet

Most online content is protected by copyright. Absence of a copyright statement does not mean you can freely copy it. Generally, you may:

- Download or print an insubstantial part of the material for personal research or private study.
- Provide links to other websites, preferably to their home pages.

You should not:

- Share copied or downloaded information across a network without permission.
- Mislead others into thinking they can copy linked material without permission.
- Make derogatory references to the site, infringing the moral rights of the copyright owner.

- Imply linked content is your own work.

Downloading material from websites is likely copyright infringement unless explicitly permitted. Ensure you have the right to copy any content from a site.

Databases

Database information is also copyrighted. Before downloading information, read the license for the source. Generally, you may:

- Download a reasonable portion of the database for personal use.
- Print a reasonable portion for personal use.

You cannot use material from a database for commercial purposes or share it with others.
